Keeping Patient Satisfaction High

Every interaction a person has with his/her physician and the office staff leaves a strong impression. Even when everyone involved does his/her best to provide quality compassionate care, sometimes things do not go as planned. Very often, patients’ and family members’ ability to communicate their needs are impacted by medication, stress or misunderstanding. To maintain the valuable trust patients place in their doctor and staff, it is important to address dissatisfaction — whether it be minor or major — as soon as possible.

When problems do arise, be sure that your staff is prepared. Develop a plan for dealing with difficulties and educate the entire staff on the importance of listening, responding with empathy, and apologizing at the first opportunity. Sometimes just acknowledging the problem and accepting responsibility is enough to resolve a situation. In every case, a staff member or supervisor should ask the patient how he or she can make the situation better and then follow through to be sure a resolution was achieved.

Seize Control of Drug Reps Visits

Managing pharmaceutical sales rep visits can consume hours of time. Multiple daily solicitations make it hard to stay on schedule. Physician office administrators can control drug rep visits and eliminate lost productivity.

❖ Work with the physician to determine which reps are important to the practice and which are irrelevant and spend time accordingly.

❖ Establish a uniform policy for receiving drug reps and be firm. It will take some time to establish an office policy, but it will save hours of staff time throughout the year.

❖ Schedule drug rep visits instead of accommodating them when they randomly arrive at the physician’s office. What are the most convenient times during the week for the physician to spend a few minutes with a drug rep?

❖ Assign a single staff member to schedule and handle drug rep visits, or consider subscribing to an online service that can schedule drug rep visits according to the physician’s preferences.
Medicare Cuts on the Horizon
Doctors will experience an approximate 10 percent Medicare reimbursement cut in 2008 due to the same law that spared them from a 5 percent cut this year, according to the Congressional Budget Office. The Tax Relief and Health Care Act of 2006 held Medicare physicians rates for 2007 at the 2006 level, but also specified that the payments would revert to the prior-law level in 2008. Physicians will absorb two years of cuts in 2008, unless Congress takes further action.

Software Upgrades
Outdated office practice software cannot keep pace with the needs of a modern physician practice. An investment in new software offers improved overall staff productivity and better compliance with HIPAA and other regulations. It also provides faster and more accurate claims processing with the ability to submit electronically.

When choosing a software package, consider how it will interact with your electronic medical records, as the data generated between the two applications will overlap. Narrow down your options by analyzing your current system and making a list of questions for vendors. Technical support is an important option. You may be able to negotiate an agreement for technical support by offering to be a visitor site where other practices can view that software in action.

Once you have purchased the software, it is vital to carefully train the staff who will be using it. Keep the transition positive and insist on full compliance so everyone adjusts to the new system as quickly as possible.

Improving the Health of Your Practice —
There are common challenges to running an efficient, yet pleasant, physician office practice. While many problems cannot be eliminated altogether, these creative solutions can help you clear the biggest hurdles.

Part I: Finding and Keeping Staff
Finding and keeping a great staff is important to every business. Maintaining a skilled and experienced team is paramount to running an efficient physician practice. One of the best ways to encourage longevity is to make the workplace more interesting. Challenging your employees in ways that keep them engaged and fulfilled will benefit your practice in the long term.

Provide solid training and support. Unfortunately, some of the critical functions in a busy office are also the most monotonous. One antidote to the tedium can be cross-training employees to perform in multiple areas of the practice. This adds variety and builds everyone’s professional credentials, as well as providing office flexibility.

You can also add an element of fun with occasional events that say you appreciate your staff’s dedication. These can be simple and inexpensive events throughout the year like hosting a staff lunch, or celebrating the change of season with an ice cream social for staff and patients.

Determining Physician Quality

Percent of people who say each of the following would tell them “a lot” about the quality of a doctor

- How many times a doctor has performed a specific medical procedure: 66%
- Whether a doctor is board certified: 65%
- How many malpractice suits a doctor has filed against him or her: 64%
- How patients who are surveyed rate how well the doctor communicates: 52%
- Whether a doctor attended a well-known medical school or training program: 37%
- Whether a doctor has admission privileges to send patients to a particular hospital: 35%
- Whether a doctor has been rated “the best” by a local newspaper or magazine: 28%
- Whether a doctor charges more than other doctors: 18%
